Q33. Finally, a current law in New York - known as the Triborough Amendment - says that if a contract between any government agency - local, county or state - in New York and its public employees expires and no new contract is in place, then all the conditions in the old contract including pay and benefits will remain in effect. Supporters of the Triborough Amendment say that since public employees cannot strike, this is the only fair way to ensure that the employer will negotiate a new contract in good faith. Opponents say that this law gives employees an unfair advantage in negotiations, particularly when the state, county or local entities are looking to reduce workforce costs. Do you support New York keeping the Triborough Amendment, or would you rather see it repealed?
